Feedback

What brought you here? What was the moment — the conversation, the discovery, the look — that made this real?

Its important because there is comfort in knowing i can control myself when know one is looking. Poor choices and bad behavior got me here but i have been p recovery and have been sober for over a year now

Which stage of the cycle do you most recognize in yourself? Describe your personal version of each stage.

It has cost me years of my life. Emotionally it has cost me a lot of self worth, self confidence, happiness. Relationally it has caused a loss in trust, love, loss of friendships, relationships. Spiritually it caused me to question my faith, question reality. Professionally it has cost me time, money, jobs.

What part of you benefits from staying the same? What does isolation protect you from?

I dont know how to be a normal person. Fears of being able to function in society, just having anxiety in general. Losing my freedom. Losing my privacy.

What has this pattern cost you — and the people closest to you? Be specific about the relational damage, not just the personal cost.

If nothing would have changed, I would have most certainly ended up in prison, with an STD, or dead.

my story story

PSB started for me at a young age. I experienced and witnessed a lot of grief and loss in my early childhood. I was always taught that sex of any kind was bad and should not engage in it until marriage. I would experience so much grief and sadness and pain, and the dopamine that sex brought me temporary happiness. It caused me to hide it, feel shame about it, guilt about it. It caused me to cheat on multiple partners. It caused me to be groomed by 2 friends. It eventually lost its meaning. Lost that special feeling. The further along and worse it got once I got to seeking out prostitutes and soliciting and going to MPs, the short burst of happiness would subside quicker and quicker and it became a necessity for me to function.

sexual integrity definition definition

It means being faithful to myself, being faithful to my wife. Leaving sex for the bedroom and places and moments specific to my wife and I. It means consciously making the choice to keep my eyes, hands, and thoughts to myself and focused on my life and my relationship with her. It means being able to go about my life and not be plagued with urges and needs to satisfy something that needs more than a temporary fix. It means getting back in touch with myself and understanding my feelings, my emotions, and why I made the choices I made. Even if it was never my fault to begin with because of trauma that I never personally invited into my life.

your entries, with no variation. This stability is a positive indicator. For your mood level, with 4 entries recorded, we'll need a bit more data to identify clear trends as you progress. Your reflection this week shared a powerful insight: "It's important because there is comfort in knowing I can control myself when no one is looking." This deeply resonates with your statement about being sober for over a year now, demonstrating a strong internal compass you've developed through persistence. You've clearly articulated the profound costs of past choices, highlighting a foundational understanding of what brought you here. You also shared very honest challenges about not knowing "how to be a normal person" and fears about functioning in society. It's meaningful to see you're already taking steps to address this, as noted in your journal about "starting to organize my life" and your commitment to "letting my wife know if I was struggling." These actions reflect true ownership and accountability, building blocks for facing those anxieties. Please keep focusing on these steps, Joe. We're here to support you in navigating these challenges. Continue this engagement into Week 2.
